Interest Rates & Lender Analysis of the Current Market

In September 2012, the Federal Reserve announced its plan to stimulate the US economy in an effort to produce jobs and decrease the national unemployment rate. The QE3 plan, also known as quantitative easing, is an unconventional stimulus tool in which the Federal Reserve plans to reduce short term interest rates in order to spark more lending and spending practices throughout the country.

This is the third time in the past four years that the Federal Reserve has attempted to dig its way out of the US financial crisis. The first time was back in 2008 when the Fed bought nearly $2.1 trillion worth of mortgaged-backed securities. Then, in August of 2010, Ben Bernanke & the Federal Reserve continued its buying practices to ensure the Fed's balance sheet. Bernanke's intentions for QE3 2012 are to reduce the cost of borrowing and decrease the housing mortgage crisis by lowering rates thus increasing wealth for many Americans with the hope that spending will increase in other sectors of the economy. Currently, the Federal Reserve plans to continue its purchasing power of QE3 through the end of 2012.

LANE4 Property Group visited with several prominent leaders in the Kansas City market to gauge how QE3 is affecting the market, and what sage advice they may offer as we move forward. According to Seth Lindsey of UMB, "If we are to assume inflation will remain low for a prolonged period (through 2015) and the unemployment rate will hover near 8%, the Federal Open Market Committee reasons that rates will be substantially low for the next two and half or three years." UMB is currently the lender for 39Rainbow Phase II, a $35,000,000 project being developed by LANE4. When asked of Seth's opinion from a local standpoint he offered, "I see increasing demand both in business and real estate loan requests. On the local commercial construction front, there seems to be a year-over-year uptick in new starts. However, UMB remains cautious with respect to balance sheet stability of sub-contractors."

"There hasn't been a lot of new construction in any one property type category over the past several years. However, at the present time, we are seeing pockets of activity within each segment, particularly multi-family and single tenant leased retail. We are seeing a greater number of financial institutions getting back into the commercial real estate market, and rates have become more and more competitive as a result. Good deals are financeable in the market by a greater number of bank participants," said Charles Gonzalez of Citizens Bank and Trust. Particularly in secondary markets such as Kansas City, new housing starts are on the rise. Developers are borrowing at low interest rates therefore yielding a high return on their investments. Until recently, investors and their lenders had been reluctant to put their finances at risk outside of the multi-family sector.

However, projects garnering interest, must inherently be "very financeable" featuring strong sponsorship groups and sound business fundamentals. LANE4 has seen increased lender interest as indicated above, however our organization is cautious to pursue any projects that do not pass a very simple lender test: good debt service coverage ratio, reasonable loan-to-value, reasonable loan-to-cost.

Interest Rates & Lender Analysis of the Current Market

Bob Arthur of Commerce Bank, a veteran of the Kansas City development and construction lending industry offered his perspective and a rational long term look at lending rates. "We are seeing pockets of activity within each segment, particularly multi-family and single tenant leased retail. We are seeing a greater number of financial institutions getting back in the commercial real estate market, and rates have become more competitive as a result. Good deals are financeable in the market by a greater number of participants." Bob indicated that the bellwether was the 10-year treasury rate dating back to 1962, which historically has been the long term interest rate that real estate rates are tied to. Prior to 2008, the rate was typically between 4 and 8% which generally meant that permanent loan rates were between 6 and 10% (a 200 basis point spread). "As can be seen by the current 10 year rate of 1.81%, we are in uncharted territory. Immediate funding loans today are written in 4-5% range with some Fannie/Freddie agency loans for multi-family in the upper 3% range."

LANE4 was very encouraged to hear from the lenders interviewed that the competitive nature of the industry is back and therefore offering competitive rates on projects. However as evidenced, testing of higher interest rates in forthcoming years of a project being constructed is highly advisable given the uncertainty that exists. In addition, a conservative underwriting of projects being considered is still widely favored by lenders.
